

Marnus Broodryk questions political parties' job creation claims

Entrepreneur and small business advocate Marnus Broodryk questioned the country's political parties' claims of job creation in the lead up to the 2019 General Elections. In a video, he drives past several election posters, which promise voters the creation of jobs.

He argues that job creation will not come from corporates or government and only come from small businesses. The video was viewed more than 500,000 times and has sparked a new debate on social media.
