

Kenya: New law could raise food prices further

Prices of food in Kenya, which have already risen by 50 percent since the start of 2008, could increase further following a new government regulation, a consumer watch group has warned.

From October, all food products sold in Kenya will have to bear an approval mark from the country's bureau of standards (KEBS), which will charge a fee for this service.

Read the full article

For more, visit: <https://www.bizcommunity.com>